

GENTLEMEN'S NIGHT

Earl. Miss Edith Morton, the niece, is accompanied by a friend, Miss Mabel West. Miss Morton, who is a girl of quiet taste, detests the social functions of city life and sees through her aunt's matrimonial ambitions for her, decides to profit by her aunt's mistake on their arrival in thinking Miss West is her niece, and pass during her visit as the poor companion. The complicated plot becomes more so when Lord Chelsea who is as afraid of being married for his title as Miss Morton is for her money, thinks it would be great fun to masquerade while in America as plain Jack Earl and his friend as a nobleman. Two love affairs between the real earl and the heiress and their friends ripen rapidly and the principal parties remain in blissful ignorance of the other's identity until the climax. Their friends, however, learn early in their acquaintance that the other is not what he pretends. Mrs. Ross made a regal society lady and carried herself with a dignity and hauteur which well became the name of "Mrs. Fitzgerald Mandeville de Smythe." Miss Ruth Adams filled the part of a sweet, ingenuous girl in a charming manner and the love scenes between her and Lord Chelsea were very prettily done. Her friend, Miss Mabel West, is a girl with social ambitions and it is really thanks to her cleverness, that the deceit is so well carried out. Miss Elsie Sargent had this difficult role and she not only looked the part but acted it exceptionally well. Mrs. A. J. Coriveau, as Jane McCarthy, the red-headed Irish maid, was the "whole thing" when she was on the stage. Mrs. Coriveau is one of the best amateurs in town and she quite eclipsed her former reputation on this occasion. The parts of Lord Chelsea and Jack Earl were splendidly interpreted by H. R. Coffin and James B. Campbell. Mr. Coffin, as the embarrassed, self-conscious lover was capital and the scenes between him and his chum were ridiculous enough. J. B. Campbell was the clown of the evening and made an equal hit as the drawing Englishman, with monocle in eye, or when in fancy dress he brought down the house by his drollery.

Refreshments of ice cream, cake and wafers were served by the social committee which consists of Mrs. Emma Montgomery, Mrs. Inez Adams, Mrs. Eva Blossom, Mrs. Eda Battles, Mrs. Ann Currier, Mrs. Flora Nelson, Mrs. Jennie Holder, Mrs. Mary Somerville, Mrs. Ella Hudson, Mrs. Eliza Spaulding, Mrs. Agnes Noel, Mrs. Florence Underwood. Punch was served by Mrs. Blossom and Mrs. Currier.
